Q: Calculating probabilities of conditional events I am not sure how to interpret this question: A car is driven at a certain speed. The mean of the distribution of speeds is 20 kilometers per hour. What is the probability that the car drives less than 16 kilometers per hour for at least 10 minutes? A: In the car driving case your reference question does exactly this, i.e. gives a formula for the probability of the desired event. In your case the reference question is not applicable as it does not know the distribution of speeds. You need to use the formula as follows: $P(X$This invention relates to the handloading of firearms and in particular to the reloading of weapons having a large number of chambers. In the reloading of a large number of firearms it is desirable to load a large number of rounds of ammunition into the chambers. U.S. Pat. No. 3,572,179 discloses a machine having a large number of chambers wherein a large number of rounds of ammunition may be simultaneously loaded into the chambers by a force required to feed the ammunition into the chamber, such as that required to insert a bullet into the chamber, may be great enough to rupture the bullet. In this patent such a large force is required to feed the bullets into the chamber because the counterbalancing of the bullet is not sufficiently strong to restrain the slide. The patentee attempts to solve this problem by providing a bullet being fed into the chamber that is reinforced with a rigid core. However, under certain high stress conditions the core fails and thus the bullet may fail to retain its integrity and rupture. Accordingly, it is desirable to construct a machine that will feed ammunition into a large number of chambers with a small force.Piper betel is a tropical plant, belonging to the Piperaceae. California is on the brink of doing something big to help climate change by becoming the first U.S. state to enact net-zero emissions by mid-century. The state Senate voted 18 to 13 on Wednesday to approve legislation to set the ambitious goal. If signed into law by Democratic Gov. Gavin Newsom, the Climate & Energy (AB 398) aims to cut emissions to 40 percent below 1990 levels by the year 2030 and 80 percent below 1990 levels by the year 2050. The bills marks the first time the Golden State has set emissions targets as early as next year. An estimated 750,000 jobs in California will be impacted by the bill, according to the nonprofit California Policy Center. This is real. California is on the brink of setting a bold target for 2050 emissions, in part because of Trump's rejection of climate action. This is the real deal. Think about it: California has the power to set a global standard on our biggest problem. — Bill McKibben (@billmckibben) May 23, 2019 "At this point, the threat of climate change is existential and the urgency of the challenge has never been more apparent," said Sen. Scott Wiener (D), the bill's author, in a statement ahead of the vote. The bill also aims to increase renewable energy use, cut greenhouse gas emissions through reductions in energy consumption, and limit emissions from cars and trucks. California has long been a leader on climate change. The state already has one of the most aggressive climate policies in the country and is one of the biggest greenhouse gas emitters, trailing only China. Several other states have made net zero emissions their policy goals. But California's bill will take their ambitions to another level by aiming for 80 percent cuts by 2050. "It will be the first state to set a more ambitious target for reducing emissions," said Anthony Leiserowitz, director of the Yale Program on Climate Change Communication, in a statement ahead of the vote. "It will be difficult to meet that target, but California is setting an example and helping inspire other states to follow their lead." California is the world's sixth-biggest economy, and is contributing to about 11 percent of global emissions.package net.java.amateras.uml.sequencediagram; import
